STAINLESS STEEL TACTILE Everlasting Tough

Stainless steel 'studs' or 'strips' are commonly used by the transportation authorities on rail transit stations or by building owners in commercial buildings/private buildings to provide guidance for movement.

Grade 316

Stainless steel is a metal alloy, made up of steel mixed with elements such as chromium, nickel, molybdenum, silicon, aluminum, and carbon. Iron mixed with carbon to produce steel is the main component of stainless steel. Chromium is added to make it resistant to rust. The main factor in the selection process for stainless steels is corrosion resistance. Careful consideration of the application should be done to enable a choice of grade to an economic minimum. Other considerations such as mechanical properties (strength and toughness). Lobby, LRT and MRT station, building walkway (interior)
